I EVER THOUGT OF HER.

BY J. HOWARD WIRT. Twas on the heights of Monterey The cannon sternly frowned,
And belohed a thousand batteries—
From out the quivering ground. Upon the heights a soldier stood.

A flag-staff in his hand, And by his vide his captain, The leader of the band. The men around were falling.

Like leaves before the blast; When bleak Arcturus sendeth forth His minions, stern and vast.

But still that noble band pressed on Amidst the lurid death That swept from out the cannon's mouth A stern Si occo's breath. He falls-the red blood pours

From out his wounded side-And there, upon that funeral ridge, He fell and gasped and died. But 'ere his soul had winged its flight To starry worlds above,

Where battle-clangor never comes-But life and truth and love. He whispered to a comrade, Who wiped his clammy brow, Tell her, lever thought of her, Amidst the battles flow.

SUMMER SONG. BY WILLIAM HOSS WALLACE.

These roses red, these roses red, To Summer's softest breezes wed. That sweep, with golden wing and mouth. From you blue chambers of the South-What sweet philosophers are they, Rejoicing in the passing ray!

See how they, with their souls of love. Bask in the splendor from above; What perfect happiness is theirs In all these evanescent airs! What though an Autumn-pall must gloom, Shall they not still enjoy their bloom?

O lovely little teachers! thus Breathe your philosophy for us: He worships best who takes the light Although at last there must be night; Nor woos the shadow of the tomb Before its time o'er Being's bloom
